

Petrică Biștran

My practice, grounded by instinct and spontaneity, offers aesthetic possibilities that often, over time, end up forming intuitive landscapes, which reflect my own creative process as well as the unfolding activities of nature around us.

Helga Borbás

My pictures are inner roads. Inner stage pictures – Imprints of pure emotional states. The bodies are twisting like a vortex, they are moving, and wrestling, blooming, decomposing, deteriorating, straining and softening. This is a series about the vulnerability of the human existence, about life and death, outburst and release.

My practice focuses on creative tendencies to manage my anxiety, through the medium of analogue photography I translate this narrative to my audience. Captured on walks I create images that cannot be edited or retaken.

Jenny Nash

For the last 5 years, my artwork has been based around the theory of "pathography". The word pathography was used by the psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud on the last page of his psychobiography of Leonardo DaVinci. He theorised that an analyst could examine the work of an artist and tell something of their unconscious, internal world.

Nigel Rudkin

Rudkin makes no apology for the fatness of his subjects, whose attitude is simply a declaration of freedom. Their bodies are transformed from those that are hidden away to those that proclaim their fatness without apology.

Francesca Serra

My abstract contemporary style was developed using the techniques learnt by watching my father, renowned professional artist Paolo Serra, as a young girl. My paintings reflect the colours of the coast and sky combined with Isabella's bright happy outlook. I work predominantly on parchment with acrylics and chalk featuring colors of turquoises, lapis blue, yellows and neons layered with gold leaf.

Pierre Verluca

In 2010 I left Paris to settle in London. Part of my artistic project is to convey and record the affective and perceptive shifts that this geographical displacement generates. I am interested in the heightened perception of depaysment and the outlook it offers into everyday life and everyday spaces.
